Partner Meghan Greenfield, was quoted in NBC News, "EPA reverses long-standing climate change finding, stripping its own ability to regulate emissions," and by Reuters in "Trump's repeal of climate rule opens a 'new front' for litigation," and in a BBC News article "Trump revokes landmark ruling that greenhouse gases endanger public health," explaining the impact of the agency's decision to repeal the "endangerment finding," the legal and scientific rule that has supported federal actions to curb heat-trapping pollution for nearly two decades.

Meghan discussed the ramifications of the Trump administration's rule-making decision and the potential for a "new front" of litigation.

"The endangerment finding has really served as the lynchpin of US regulation of greenhouse gases -- that includes motor vehicles, but it also includes power plants, the oil and gas sector, methane from landfills, even aircraft. So, it really runs the gamut, all of the standards for each of the sectors is premised on this one thing."
