Alongside Joanna, panelists with backgrounds in psychology, law, and investigations examined why memory is reconstructive, how stress, trauma, and external influences shape recollection, and how investigators can guard against bias when weighing witness accounts alongside documentary evidence.

As Chair of Jenner & Block’s London Public Law and Crisis Management Practice and co-chair of the firm’s Investigations Department, Global Hearing Preparation, and Global Crisis Management and Strategic Risk practices, Joanna advises major corporations, regulators, and public bodies on contentious regulatory investigations, corporate crime, and administrative and public law. She also counsels C-suite executives and boards on regulatory compliance and reputational issues, and has advised clients on some of the United Kingdom’s most high-profile public inquiries.
