Based in London, Karam advises organisations and individuals on ESG-related legal and reputational risk, including business and human rights, investigations, compliance, and diverging ESG requirements across jurisdictions. She helps multinational clients navigate EU and US ESG requirements that pull in different directions, working with leadership teams to determine a workable path forward. Karam also conducts sensitive workplace investigations into social and governance issues and helps clients build practical ESG compliance programmes.

In her profile, Karam explains that one sustainability issue that will matter significantly in the years to come is the growing litigation, public and political scrutiny of whether companies do what they say in the sustainability sphere. She describes how compliance with sustainability disclosure requirements is only the start for companies. Once a statement is public, it invites scrutiny and potential litigation from NGOs, investors, journalists, and others, and for multinationals, a statement required in one jurisdiction can prompt scrutiny in another.

Partner Lucy Blake said: "What sets Karam apart is how she connects the dots across a fragmented regulatory landscape." She also added that Karam's "thorough yet practical approach has made her a valuable presence in building ESG compliance programmes clients can actually live with day to day."
