Overview

Gregory assists telecommunications and technology companies both big and small before the Federal Communications Commission and other federal and state regulators. He focuses his practice on complex issues at the forefront of communications policy, advocating for clients seeking subsidies for broadband networks, approval for mergers and acquisitions, and changes to the telecom landscape. Gregory has experience with wireline, wireless, media, satellite, and enforcement matters, specifically advising on universal service, infrastructure policy, space safety, and grant programs.

As a former honors attorney in the FCC's Wireline Competition Bureau, Gregory brings his government experience to the client relationship, helping to demystify complex regulatory processes and work toward achieving actionable results. He has helped clients obtain a range of favorable outcomes, from billion-dollar broadband grants to Special Temporary Authority licenses.

While in law school, Gregory served as executive editor of the Cardozo Law Review. He also has a penchant for number crunching and enjoys helping clients solve problems that require both legal and data analysis.
