

“Navigating United States Trade Policy to Achieve Climate Targets,” Pratt’s Energy Law Report

Publications

January 2024

By: Arie T. Feltman-Frank, Kate Abendroth

Companies that are able to access funding and tax credits to promote and develop clean technologies may find themselves hamstrung by trade restrictions that make it difficult to get the raw materials and products needed to advance these technologies. Associates Arie Feltman-Frank and Kate Abendroth joined former Special Counsel Tanja Vujic to examine the trade policies that are relevant to the advancement of the technology needed to transition to a climate-neutral economy and suggest ways to navigate these policies to advance specific business objectives. They conclude with next steps, observing that “companies should ensure that their interests are adequately represented and advocated for in trade restriction proceedings.”
