By: James Rogers

Partner James Rogers was quoted in The Telegraph, sharing his insights on the UK's decision to withdraw from the Energy Charter Treaty (ECT).

James said, "Withdrawing from the treaty may not bring the benefits that the Government hopes and may actually make the UK a less attractive option for international investment in our renewable energy sector, as well as jeopardising UK investments abroad."

An international arbitration lawyer in Jenner & Block's London office, James serves his clients' needs across multiple jurisdictions and tailored to the relevant project, dispute and/or seat of arbitration. He has particular experience in the energy, mining, infrastructure, technology, and construction sectors and significant recent experience in arbitration matters involving states and state-controlled entities.
