Partner Keisha Stanford, Chair of the Anti-Corruption and FCPA Practice, shares her thoughts on the Department of Justice's new whistleblower program in an article for GIR.

Titled "Lawyers Say the DOJ's New Whistleblower Programme Will Fill Some Gaps – But How Many Remains To Be Seen," the article features leading practitioners like Keisha in a discussion about DOJ's latest effort to prosecute more corporate crime.

In the article, Keisha suggests that the program may indeed encourage more companies to bolster compliance policies. But she expresses concern that the incentives could prompt whistleblowers to turn to DOJ first, rather than working through their company's internal reporting channels.

Ultimately, she and other lawyers observe that it's too early to determine the program's success or failure.

"I think the [DOJ] has a lot of policies coming out at the same time, and the refinement of some existing policies. I think it's an interesting time, and it'll be interesting to see how these policies work with each other," she says.
