By: Stephen Ascher, Jason P. Hipp, Dylan Madoff

In this article, Partners Stephen Ascher and Jason Hipp and Associates Melissa Fedornak and Dylan Madoff offer guidance from a litigator’s perspective on how to draft “no-shop” provisions that can protect corporate clients if a deal breaks down.

The authors explain that such provisions can become a “critical battleground” for any litigation should a deal fall apart because of a competing offer. They describe four key decisions that should inform the drafting of these agreements: duration, scope, choice of law, and remedy.
