By: Arie T. Feltman-Frank

In an article for Pratt’s Energy Law Report, Associate Arie Feltman-Frank examines pollution monitoring by satellite and advancements in remote sensing technologies, particularly in their ability to continuously monitor, detect, and quantify greenhouse gas emissions and attribute emissions to individual sources. He discusses the legal risks of publicly available satellite-derived emissions data and discusses how to prepare for what is to come.

“Companies should especially consider how remote sensing technologies may fit in with certain federal and state efforts to quantify and reduce greenhouse gas emissions,” he writes.
