“Law360 chose Unikowsky after examining his work and speaking with appellate scholars and practitioners. That research produced a portrait of an attorney who's won most of his arguments at the high court and is exceptionally adept at identifying cases that the justices are likely to take up,” the publication said.

Adam’s profile highlights his undergraduate and graduate degrees in electrical engineering and computer science from the Massachusetts Institute of Technology and legal newsletter published on Substack.

When asked which of his Supreme Court arguments stand out, Adam discussed his work in Washington Department of Licensing v. Cougar Den, Inc.

“Very interesting case, very fascinating issues, great clients,” he said. “It was about the interpretation of a treaty signed in 1855. There was a provision saying that the tribal members had a right to travel, and the court had never before interpreted that provision. So you're really arguing from first principles. We had to really get into the historical aspects of it and also figure out the practical aspects of the case.”
