The article, "Google's breakup trial is turning into a fight for the future of AI," explores how the case could reshape competition in the rapidly evolving artificial intelligence market. As federal prosecutors argue that Google's dominance in search threatens the growth of AI-powered competitors, Doug weighed in on the broader implications of the trial.

"The future of competition in search actually might be in generative AI. That's one thing the court will need to grapple with," Doug noted.

He also addressed proposals to force Google to share its search index, cautioning that such remedies could conflict with established antitrust precedent. "The antitrust laws don't require even a monopolist to share its competitive advantage with rivals," he said, citing the Supreme Court's ruling in Verizon Communications v. Trinko. "Forced sharing has a lot of problems to it — one is it requires the court to be a regulator, and ongoing monitor."
