Partner Aaron Cooper, founding co-chair of Jenner & Block's new Critical and Emerging Technologies Practice, spoke with Law360 about the launch of the practice group, which will help clients navigate this moment of accelerating legal and regulatory change.

"Companies that develop emerging tech are confronting new national security regulations, challenges in access to energy, export controls, and foundational questions about safety, security, and alignment," Aaron said in the article. "At the same time, those deploying emerging tech have to be smart about understanding capabilities and suitability for purpose, especially in high-risk and highly regulated environments."

Jenner's multidisciplinary Critical and Emerging Technologies Practice supports companies operating at the forefront of technological advancement—including in artificial intelligence, cybersecurity, semiconductors, cloud infrastructure, and quantum computing—by providing fully integrated, client-focused counsel. The practice combines strategic insight with legal fluency across disciplines like national security, investigations, energy, data privacy, IP, and corporate law.
