By: Christine Braamskamp

London Managing Partner Christine Braamskamp has built a career at the intersection of cultural awareness and cross-border collaboration. In an interview with International Comparative Legal Guides, she reflects on the art of cross-border cooperation, the evolving landscape of DEI, and why she believes the next generation of lawyers will reshape the profession for the better.

In this interview, Christine discusses her experience practising in both civil and common law systems, emphasising that success in cross-border investigations relies on building strong, trusted relationships with law firms across different jurisdictions.

She explains how Jenner & Block's Culture Risk and Sensitive Investigations practice evolved during the pandemic in response to increased workplace activism and the need for companies to effectively triage complaints and allegations. Christine cautions against generational division in the profession, urging collaboration rather than positioning one generation against another.

On the future of the profession, Christine expresses optimism about the impact of AI and evolving workplace expectations, emphasising that firms must actively adapt their culture and policies rather than waiting for change to happen.
